Not illustrated. 1856 Excerpt: ...its face, it was recognized to be the prince of Wales. Eager to reap the full reward of his exploit, he cut off the head of the corpse, and carried it to Edward, who sent it to London, placed a silver crown upon it as a mark of derision, exhibited it to the populace in Cheapside, and at last fixed it upon the Tower. David succeeded to the sovereignty-of Wales upon the death of Llewellyn; but he was unable to collect an army sufficient to meet the English in battle. He was chased from hill to hill, and hunted from one retreat to another. At length, after concealing himself under various disguises, he was betrayed in his lurkingplace to the English. He was sent in chains to Shrewsbury, where Edward caused him to be tried before the peers of England. He was sentenced to be hanged, drawn, and quartered, and this barbarous punishment was carried into effect. Edward, moreover, sensible that nothing kept alive the military spirit of the people, and the remembrance of their ancient glory, so much as the traditional poetry of the country, which, assisted by the power of music, and the jollity of festivals, made a deep impression on the minds of youth, is said to have gathered together all the Welsh bards, and ordered them to be put to death. This act has been called in question. The disappearance of the bards is by some writers ascribed to the overthrow of the independent sovereignties of Wales, which deprived the wandering minstrels of all patronage and support. The conquest of Wales is said to have given a title to the eldest son of the king of England. According to a story related by the monkish writers, Edward, shortly after the subjugation of the country, assembled the Welsh chieftains, and promised to give them for sovereign a prince of unexceptionable manners...
