Not illustrated. 1835 Excerpt: ...religion, viz: the influence of its clergy in protecting us against popular tumults; and my answer is--that the population which can be governed thus by the power of superstition is a dangerous population--and the power which governs it a dangerous power--and I allude to the panic and military array in Boston to illustrate the peril and commotion which a small body of Catholic population may produce in spite of clerical power--and to place in merited contempt, the idea that the Catholic religion should be advocated on the ground of its power of protecting Protestant republicans, against the violence of its own people. And I am sure I express but a small portion of the disgust which was felt in Boston at the sycophantic eulogies of the Catholic religion, and of the Catholic bishop--as if he had immortalized himself, and placed Boston under everlasting obligations for having done what was as much the dictate of a sagacious policy as it was also the dictate of duty. But, it is said, "the Catholics do not interfere at all with the religion of their Protestant pupils. They have no such design. They promise not to do it, and only require as a matter of decency and order a conformity to the rules of the school." They cannot help interfering with the religion of their pupils. The known opinions and kind attentions of instructors sedulous to please, and a constant familiarity with their example and religious instruction and the doctrines, prayers, ceremonies and worship of the church, cannot fail to affect the mind of Protestant youth--allaying apprehension, conciliating affection, inspiring confidence and undermining their Protestant education--until they became either sceptics, or devotees, or at least the friends and apologists and auxiliaries of Cathol...
